Law firms

Law firms often bill by the hour, so by reducing the need for travel by replacing physical meetings with virtual meetings, firms can free up more time to be spent working on profitable cases, reducing costs and driving business growth.

Law firms no longer need to be concerned about the infrastructure, management, security and the need for specialist skill sets to support video conferencing - so they can spend more time growing their practices and retaining clients.

Internally, and especially with firms operating from multiple international locations, employees can collaborate together, train together, quicken the decision making process and interact in a border-less world, all through the simplicity of video.

Legal training

Video conferencing, and the ability to share content and record video calls gives a whole new dimension to legal training (CPD), enabling students and trainees to revisit video training content whenever and wherever they need to.

Students will benefit from learning from real life situations such as complex legal conferences, trial hearings, testimonies and much more, anywhere in the world.

Working Pro-bono

Legal professionals providing Pro-bono services to clients can do so more cost effectively and efficiently with video, without the need for travel, enabling them to provide more legal aid, whilst freeing up more time to spend on profitable cases, driving increased revenues and growing reputation.

Witness statements and testimonies

Witnesses and experts can often be tricky to access, particularly if this means long distance travel or other inconveniences. With video conferencing, these people can be instantly connected remotely and securely.

Witnesses and those giving testimonies in court may often feel more comfortable, willing and confident providing their statements and answering questions remotely, rather than being exposed to potentially intimidating situations in the presence of defendants and prosecutors.

Connecting courts to prisons

National and local courts can use video conferencing to easily and securely communicate face to face with prisoners during hearings and appeals, without the need to transport them, increasing efficiencies, safety and reducing costs.

In Pennsylvania they did just this, and saved more than $1 million on transportation costs by linking their county courtrooms to the county prison via video conferencing.

These video calls can also be recorded, an important feature for all areas of the legal system, allowing them to revisit meetings, hearings and testimonies for on-going, unsolved, or reopened cases, as well as serving as evidence.
